TO THE MEMORY OF

SIR GEORGE GRIERSON, O.M.

PREFACE

THE beginnings of this book go back over half a century. The year 1912 when I first met Jules Bloch saw for me the beginnings of a friendship which was to last till his death in 1953. He was then writing La Langue Marathe of which in 1914 he sent me an advance copy.[1] I had myself already collected material for articles on the phonology of Gujarātī and, since coming to India in 1913, had gained some knowledge of Hindī. The following four years of active service in the Indian Army provided me with much first-hand material from another Indo-aryan language, namely Nepāli; and during these years the idea formed itself of a comparative dictionary, perhaps somewhat on the lines of W. Meyer-Lübke's Romanisches Etymologisches Wörterbuch, in which to present the vocabulary of the New Indo-aryan languages in so far as it was derived from Sanskrit. This idea was encouraged by Sir George Grierson, who proposed that such a dictionary should form an appendix to the volumes of his great Linguistic Survey of India then, in 1920, still in process of publication.[2] Although after his death in 1941 in his ninety-first year[3] and with the coming of Independence his proposal was put on one side by the Government of India, I have dedicated to the memory of this good man and great scholar a work which, imperfect and incomplete though it is, owes its existence to him.

Although the material for this book continued to be collected over a period of forty years, in the last twenty of these the claims made upon my time by duties as Director of the School of Oriental and African Studies, both during the Second World War[4] and the subsequent period of rapid expansion, precluded me from fully indexing material contained in the works of both earlier and contemporary scholars. When in my seventieth year I was once more able to devote all my energies to its compilation, no one could have been more conscious than I of the lacunae which waited to be filled. There were two alternatives: either to attempt to fill them with little prospect of being given time to complete anything for publication or to put what was already collected into a form utilizable by others. The many inquiries received throughout the years for information available in these collections decided me to adopt the latter alternative and to publish the work as it now stands. I can only hope that the use to which students of the history of the Indo-aryan languages will be able to put it will make them lenient critics of its manifold imperfections and omissions.

But for one scholar these imperfections would have been far greater still. When the Publications Committee of the School of Oriental and African Studies undertook complete financial responsibility for publication, Mr. (now Professor) J. C. Wright agreed to assist in reading the proofs. In the event, over the past eight years, he has done much more and has in fact been a collaborator responsible for many improvements. All the references to and explanations of Sanskrit forms (especially from about page 300 onwards) and consequently many of the proposed etymologies owe very much to Professor Wright's profound and extensive knowledge of the vocabulary of both Vedic and Classical Sanskrit. The number of notes to which the initials J. C. W. are attached is not at all a true measure of the great contribution he has made.

As I thus come to the end of the work and look back over the fifty years that have seen its growth, the happiest memories are those of the many friends and colleagues who have so

[1] Owing to the outbreak of war formal publication was delayed till 1920.

[2] In the Preface to Volume I, Part I, it was announced as Volume I, Part III, Comparative Dictionary of the Indo-Aryan Languages.

[3] The obituary in Proceedings of the British Academy wrongly states that Grierson's last publication was an article in 1933. To the deputation presenting to him in January 1936 the volume of the Bulletin of the School of Oriental Studies compiled in honour of his eighty-fifth birthday he himself presented a copy of his latest work The Test of a Man: being the Purusha-parīkshā of Vidyâpati Ṭhakkura, published only a few days previously.

[4] Owing to the threat of invasion and the menace of bombing the collections lay for some years buried in a pit dug to the distant rumbling of the Dunkirk guns.

unstintingly given me help and advice. Not a few, alas, are, like Sir George Grierson and Jules Bloch, no longer with us: Lieut.-Col. D. L. R. Lorimer, C.I.E., who generously put at my disposal his vocabularies of Khowar and Shina[1]; Professor Helmer Smith; my old colleagues the Revd. W. Sutton-Page, Dr. T. Grahame Bailey, and the Revd. D. Emlyn Evans; my old pupils Dr. B. S. Pandit, Dr. B. D. Jain, and Professor Raghu Vira.

The Kafiri and Dardic groups of languages, even if politically of little import, are linguistically of great interest. We owe our knowledge of them to Professor Georg Morgenstierne more than to any other. Throughout a friendship which now goes back over more than forty years, he has constantly put his notes and vocabularies at my disposal even before their publication, while his advice and help have been a constant source of encouragement.

Three of my old pupils have been mentioned above. Among others happily still with us are my very first pupil in this field, Professor Baburam Saksena, who was with me as an Advanced Student at the Hindu University of Benares in 1921 and is now Vice-Chancellor of Raipur University; Professor Siddheshwar Varma to whom we owe important studies of West Pahāṛī dialects; Dr. S. M. Katre, Principal of the Deccan College and originator in chief of the Sanskrit Lexicon in preparation at Poona. To two others I owe a particular debt: Dr. P. B. F. Wijeratne, Editor-in-Chief of the Sinhalese Dictionary, who in his articles in BSOAS and in an etymological glossary of words from the inscriptions[2] added very much to Geiger's etymological material; Dr. T. N. Dave who read through all the Gujarātī slips and made many valuable suggestions.

To Sir Harold Bailey I am deeply grateful for our long years of friendship and for the wealth of information with which he always met a query about Iranian or about Indian words in Central Asia. To Professor John Brough too I have seldom turned in vain. Mr. C. H. B. Reynolds went through all the Sinhalese material in the earlier fascicles. More recently I have had much help from Professor M. Mayrhofer whose Kurzgefasstes etymologisches Wörterbuch des Altindischen nears completion, and Professor G. Buddruss who has made a number of suggestions from his own studies of Kafiri and Dardic dialects.

To the Publications Committee of the School of Oriental and African Studies for undertaking full financial responsibility for this book I have already expressed my gratitude. To its Secretary, Mr. J. R. Bracken, I am deeply indebted for all the help and advice he has given and the patient hearing he has invariably accorded my queries and suggestions. I wish too to thank the Printer to the University of Oxford and his staff for their work in setting up a very complicated text. To Margaret Gregory-Smith whose constant care has done so much to sustain me through many strenuous years I owe a deep debt of gratitude.

Such value as this work may have will, I believe, be greatly increased by the volume of indexes of all words quoted in the Dictionary, arranged by languages and now nearly ready for printing. This, like the similar indexes of the Comparative and Etymological Dictionary of the Nepali Language, is the work of my wife, who moreover through the forty-seven years of our married life, in the midst of all her household and public responsibilities, has taken charge of the ever-growing mass of slips. What I wrote in the Nepali Dictionary in 1930 is even more true today: without her constant help and encouragement the task would never have been accomplished.

INTRODUCTION

ALTHOUGH the form of this work was suggested by W. Meyer-Lübke's Romanisches Etymologisches Wörterbuch, the head-words under which the material is collected do not represent the vocabulary of a real and comparatively uniform language at all comparable with that of the actual Latin the history of which Meyer-Lübke followed into the modern Romance languages and which was in regular use for writing and administration over the whole Roman Empire and was the common speech of a large proportion of its inhabitants.

The phonetic systems of nearly all the New Indo-aryan languages are descended directly from that of the Ṛgveda[1] with one exception. Whereas Indo-european ḱ, ǵ, ǵh were represented by ś, j, h in the Ṛgveda, in the Kafiri group they were retained in the intermediate stage of dental affricate as ts, dz; IE. gʷh before palatal vowel which like ǵh was opened to h in the Ṛgveda retained its occlusion as ǰ (ž) in Kafiri. It will therefore be realized that Kafiri words with these sounds are not to be derived immediately from the head-words under which they are shown: see, e.g., śiras-, dáśa, jānāti, *hadas-, hánati. One other possible divergence going back to a pre-Indo-aryan stage is the emergence in Middle Indo-aryan of (j)jh ~ kṣ as different developments of earlier gzh*; but both forms, having had wide expansion and not disclosing any dialectic boundaries in New Indo-aryan, will be found among the head-words with suitable cross-references: see, e.g., kṣárati and jharati.

In some cases an older form has been replaced by an analogical creation, e.g. dūḍhi- RV. (<duẓ-dhi-*) ~ durdhī- MBh. In other cases the original survives only in New Indo-aryan, e.g. niḍāti (<niẓ-dā-*) ~ nir-dāṭṛ- Mn., būḍhi- (<budʰ-dhi-*) ~ buddhi- Mn. In compounds the unexploded final -t of ut may be expected to be lost before following st(h), giving rise to ust(h)- attested in Middle and New Indo-aryan, although dialectically or through analogical replacement appearing only as utt(h)- in Sanskrit. Similarly ut before initial ś- appears most frequently in MIA. and NIA. as uśś- (uss-), whereas Sanskrit always has ucch-. To allow for the divergent development in such cases the head-word has been shown with ut-sth-, *ut-ś-: see, e.g., ut-sthāti, *ut-śirsa-.

Generally speaking, however, the head-words have the phonetic structure proper to the earliest recorded form of the language which, while still comparatively uniform, was brought into India by the Aryan invaders. But even a cursory examination of Professor M. Mayrhofer's Kurzgefasstes etymologisches Wörterbuch des Altindischen will show that during the long history of this language as a literary medium in the form of Sanskrit a very large proportion of its vocabulary arose from internal development or came from external sources at a period when the various spoken languages derived from the Vedic speech had already greatly altered its phonetic form and grammatical structure. Many of the head-words, like so much of classical Sanskrit vocabulary, are in reality Middle Indo-aryan clothed, for the convenience of presentation, in an earlier phonetic dress. An example of this is provided by compounds with verbal prefixes: Oṛiyā uā 'boiled sun-dried rice', Sinhalese avuva 'sunshine' are, like Prakrit āyava-, derived from ātapá-, or Hindī āyat m. 'sunshine' from ātapta-; but Khowar ātʌpik 'to have high fever' must rest either upon a late MIA. ātapp-* (newly formed compound with ā from tappaï) or upon MIA. āttapp-* with analogical -tt- (after type ā-tt- < ā-tr-, etc.). The headword ātapyatē under which the Khowar word appears is thus in reality a Middle Indo-aryan word in Old Indo-aryan form.

[1] The change of -d- and -dh- to -ḷ- and -ḷh- was not universal.

Owing to differences of dialect or of time at which many of the loanwords from Muṇḍā, Dravidian, or other languages came into Indo-aryan, they appear in forms which cannot be referred to a single Indo-aryan form, especially in the case of names of animals and plants. In such cases the New Indo-aryan words may be collected under more than one head-word with appropriate cross-references: see, e.g., mayūra-, śvāvídh-, kṛmukā-.

A particular class of words are those I have termed 'defective'. These are adjectives which express, from language to language, almost any defect, whether physical, mental, or moral. They display, within a single language or from language to language, an almost bewildering variety of form, involving interchange of single with double consonant, aspirates with non-aspirates, voiced with unvoiced, dental with retroflex, nasalized vowel with unnasalized, vocalization with a or i/ē varying with u/ō: see bukka-[4] and the list of similar series there given. The variety of form is no doubt due to a variety of causes: they are liable as 'expressive' words to changes which indicate emphasis, as derogatory words to deliberate deformation, and under both headings to the formation of rhyme-words. While some, e.g. baṇḍá-, are found in Vedic, and some, e.g. kuṇṭha-, have parallels in Iranian, and some, e.g. runda-, possibly derive from Indo-european, a large number appear to come from non-Aryan sources—Dravidian and especially Muṇḍā—and may owe some of their diversity of form to different dialects within those language-groups (see in the last instance F. B. J. Kuiper in Lingua 14, 54–86). There are parallel series of words meaning 'lump' with the same variation of form: see, e.g., lakka-[2] ~ lakka-[1].

In the spelling of new Indo-aryan words, the practice of the particular dictionaries and vocabularies from which they have been taken has in general been followed. This has led to a number of inconsistencies: for example, the confusion of long and short e and o, or the unequal differentiation between palatals and dental affricates (c, j ~ ć, ǰ) in the Pahāṛī languages. In some cases where a dictionary confuses phonetic with traditional spelling, the phonetic has been used throughout in transcribing from devanāgarī: thus in Assamese the devanāgarī palatals, both non-aspirate and aspirate, have been regularly transcribed as s and z. For the Kafiri and Dardic languages (in which Morgenstierne, like Lorimer, has used č and ǰ for palatals, c and j for dental affricates) I have retained ć and ǰ (as also for Gypsy), and have used ć and ǰ for dental affricates, ç and j for retroflex. The acute accent ´, which is used in Sanskrit words for a tone (udātta), indicates a stress when used in NIA. words; the grave `, which is the svarita of Sanskrit, denotes a falling tone in NIA. words.

The head-words, numbered for subsequent reference in the indexes, are printed in heavy type, for example 1100 áñjana-. Its descendants in Middle and New Indo-aryan are printed in italic: Pa. añjana-, Ash. aná, etc. Any form within an article printed in small capitals, e.g. AJÑĀNIN-, will be found as a head-word in its alphabetic place. So too the words in small capitals at the end of an article which record the derivatives of the head-word (e.g. ĀÑJANÍYA-) or the compounds in which it occurs (e.g. ŚŌBHĀÑJANA-). Discussion of the earlier history of the head-words, especially where the more modern forms throw light upon it, or of their connexion with other head-words is contained in the square brackets. If, as in this instance, these contain a root (e.g. √AÑJ), this will be found in its alphabetic position in heavy capitals (AÑJ) followed by all forms which can be grouped as belonging to the root and which have been or will be entered as head-words in their due alphabetic places (e.g. AKTÁ-, AÑJÁTI, ÁÑJANA-, ÚPĀKTA, VYÀKTA-, SAMAÑJATI, etc., etc.).

The order in which words from new Indo-aryan languages are quoted is purely geographical, being based on their present distribution rather than on any special dialectic connexions among them. Beginning in the West with European dialects of Gypsy, it moves through the Ḍumāki of Hunza (like Gypsy, belonging originally to a language group of India proper) to Kafiri and Dardic, Kashmiri, Sindhī, Lahndā, Panjābī, along the Himalaya to West and Central Pahāṛī groups, to Nepāli and Assamese, south to Bengali and Oṛiyā, westward again across the Gangetic plain through Bihārī, Maithilī, Bhojpurī, Hindī to the Rājasthānī dialects, south again through Gujarātī to Marāṭhī and Koṅkaṇī, and finally to Sinhalese (whose closer linguistic connexion is rather with the eastern languages, especially Oṛiyā) and out in the Indian Ocean to the dialect spoken in the Maldive Islands.
